

Susan Magrino Agency
 352 Park Avenue South, 13 FL
 New York, NY 10010
 212.957.3005
 www.smapr.com

SECTION T The Record Travel SUN. 09.29.13

A Vespa tour arrives at Rome's Palazzo Venezia and the monument to King Victor Emmanuel II. Below, Audrey Hepburn and Gregory Peck in "Roman Holiday."

ROME ON TWO WHEELS

By KELLY DINARDO
 THE WASHINGTON POST

Sitting on the back of the Vespa, I watch the dark green ocean inch closer and closer. We're stopped at a traffic light, and the car's Italian driver, chatting loudly on his cellphone, isn't paying attention. Just as his vehicle drifts across the line and threatens to knock into us, the driver of my scooter slams her palm down on the hood. Startled, the man stops back to reality and hits the brakes.

The light changes, and our Vespa hurtles forward, leaving the chaotic look of Roman traffic in the dust. Ciao, amici!

This wasn't my first Audrey Hepburn moment in Rome. Several months earlier, I'd clung to a friend as he scooted us to dinner on an all-400-beret ride that was both a wind-blowing-through-my-hair thrill, taking us past dramatically lighted churches and ruins, and a white-knuckle terror as we weaved around distracted drivers and gaping tourists.

Italians' love affair with the Vespa has been going on since 1946, when the manufacturer Piaggio first introduced the wasp-shaped scooter (Vespa means wasp in Italian) to the market. When Audrey Hepburn and Gregory Peck, buzzed through the Italian capital in the 1953 film "Roman Holiday" — the first in a long line of actors to pose outside a Vespa — the scooter's popularity shot into overdrive. Today,

VESPAS AN IDEAL WAY TO TOUR CITY AND BEAT THE TRAFFIC SNARLS

Go for the food, and try on the wigs

By JERRY LUCIANI
 STAFF WRITER

Unbelievably soft beaches, warm and welcoming locals, an interesting cultural history and relaxed pace — for all these reasons and a few more, Turks and Caicos Islands had made it onto my travel bucket list years ago.

In the last few years, the islands added a three-day gastronomical marathon to their celebration calendar. And when the enthusiastic reviews started circulating, we decided to upgrade Turks and Caicos (TCI, for short) from a line on our list to a done vacation deal.

It seemed pretty obvious: Afix sun, sand and swaying palms with meals created by celebrity chefs and master sommeliers and you've got the ingredients for a pretty extraordinary tropical getaway.

And that was before we added the wig people to the mix.

The wig people we couldn't have anticipated.

We'd gotten into Providenciales, the island's capital, late on a Friday afternoon in October. We checked into our hotel, grabbed a quick dinner and, as darkness fell, were making our way to the beach bar when we no-

See TURKS AND CAICOS Page T-3

A Junkanoo band plays at the Lounge at Grace Bay Club, where Mary Luciani and Brigitte Hasbrou (inset) try on beads and feather masks.

DEALS

Fitness retreat in Malibu

The deal: The Four Seasons Westlake Village has teamed up with The Franch at Live Oak/Malibu and the California Health & Longevity Institute to offer a four-day fitness program.

Cost: $3,800 per person.

What's included: Accommodations at Four Seasons Hotel Westlake Village and access to spa; daily routine of 8 to 10 hours of exercises including hiking, ab workouts, toning, group yoga sessions and daily massage; daily 1,400-calorie diet; fitness testing; nutrition classes and cooking demonstrations; a la carte services like acupuncture, hypnotherapy and energy healing at an additional cost.

Where: Thursday-Monday stays, ongoing.

Information: TheFranchMalibu.com or 866-777-6177.

—Elyse Terbo

SIGNS OF THE TIMES

We asked you to share your pictures of signs that have left you puzzled or amused:

Rich Esteson of Glen Rock came across this sign on the observation deck of the CN Tower in Toronto. "We don't necessarily want to climb on the deck's fencing, at 1,135 feet above the ground."

Send your photos to my@nyerj.com/traveldeals, and include where the sign is located. The gallery of submissions can be viewed online.

And follow all Schedules during the week on her blog myfourthsey.com/openroad and via Twitter (@jschensul) for the latest news and deals.

Susan Magrino Agency
352 Park Avenue South, 13 FL
New York, NY 10010
212.957.3005
www.smapr.com

Turks and Caicos: Festival

From Page T-1
faced something odd: One of the women dancing to the music at the beach bar seemed to be having a very bad hair day. Big hair, all over the place, and strangely colored, too. With a second glance, the vision became clearer: It wasn't bad hair. It was a great wig.
She wasn't the only one with a great wig, we realized. Half the people dancing and drinking were also sporting great wigs: Crazy wigs, flame-red ones, sparkly gold ones, neon blues, even a colonial-era model and one that looked like Wolverine, complete with sideburns.
"What's the deal with the wigs?" I asked one wigged woman on the dance floor. She explained that a group of friends from around the country got together every fall for their annual "Wigoberfest."

"This year two friends were getting married, so the party went international," she said. If it's good luck to see a bride, it's even better luck to be a wigged one. Anyone within the wig people's orbit was pulled into their gravitational field — and provided appropriate hair-wear.
Let's just say after you don a big purple afro it's hard not to have a good time.
Yes, this tropical experience was starting off in an extraordinary way. Let the food and wine fun begin.

The official festival activities began with cocktails at sunset on Saturday, so we spent most of the day enjoying all the usual things we love about the islands. We headed straight for the beach and with our first steps understood why people called it remarkable. My feet were sinking into the soft sand. I'd ever walked on sand (I've walked on a lot). The beach stretched out to our left and right as far as we could see and beyond. Seen Mary, PhD in hand, headed off to slip into an umbrella-shaded chaise longue, and I made a beeline for the twinkling turquoise water.
This is what I love best about the islands: Floating along, just watching the wonders of the sea moosey by. A barracuda buzzing past, in a hurry, a huge starfish splayed on the sandy bottom, a flotilla of juvenile parrotfish sailing silently past, heads bobbing in unison.

Eventually, I made my way to a cluster of artificial "reef balls" I'd heard about — Swiss-cheese-like cement structures placed about 100 yards offshore in 2007 to protect the beach from erosion, and also to serve as a home for sea life. Today snorkelers can enjoy the results of the project. The reef balls are covered with coral and teeming with marine life. I must have floated over that reef area for an hour, just watching the fish dart in and out.

My wife and I don't consider ourselves "foodies" — though Mary says I'm addicted to TV cooking shows. But we do appreciate good food — and TCI has singled out for its lively dining scene. Away.com has it ranked as one of its top-10 foodie destinations in the world.
The food and wine festival was launched as a way to promote TCI as a major food destination in the Caribbean. It didn't take long for the festival to start making waves among those who travel with food in mind.

It's also been able to draw big celebrity chefs and sommeliers to cook, lecture and give demonstrations. "By involving such a talented roster of experts and exploring new event concepts for guests, we are paving the way to make the Caribbean Food and Wine Festival one of the most sought-after events in the Caribbean," said Nikhilee Advani, the festival's chief operating officer.
Brette Hashron, who writes The Food Tease blog, had made the trip from her home in Ottawa specifically for the festival. "I couldn't go to Mistura — the largest food festival in the world [held in Peru] due to concerns of me traveling alone." She discovered the TCI fest in the course of researching alternatives. "The timing was perfect ... for me to attend this food orgy of sorts."

The highlight of the festival was the Gourmet Safari, a movable food party complete with luncheon parade ... with stops at five of the hottest restaurants in Turks and Caicos.
The Safari begins with a cocktail reception at The Lounge at Grace Bay Club. This is where we get the shiny beaded necklaces and feather masks that served as the official uniform of festival participants. The lounge offered great sunset views, periodically updated by the parade of hors d'oeuvres passing by: sweet and tangy lobster, Muscovy duck confit; corn and pumpkin quiche; crackling jerk-roasted pork belly; and lionfish pizzetta. I was surprised to see the latter on the menu; as a scuba diver, I knew lionfish were venomous. I had no idea they were edible ... and delicious.
As night fell we headed off to our first dinner course. At Coyaba restaurant we sampled zucchini, cauliflower, onion baji, curried ackee salad, roasted beet, love apple terrine, goat cheese quagale and a shot of pumpkin soup, all topped off with a papaya brulée.

Next up was the fish course at Parallel 23 at The Regent Palms, starting a delicately poached Chilean sea bass in tomato broth with chorizo-topped Mediterranean crostons dotted with a yellow pepper and saffron sauce. The surf and turf entrée at the beautiful Seven Stars Resort included venison and langoustine paired with ultra-rich oxtail and foie gras cannelloni. The evening ended with a delectable dulce de leche parfait spiked with blackberry compote, citrus shortbread crumble and crystallized Thai ginger served in a chocolate cup at Stelle at Gineprover.
By midnight we could barely crawl back to our hotel to recharge for day two on the food trail.

We didn't have to travel far the next morning to continue the trail. Our hotel was hosting the four food and wine tasting classes, led by the headliner chefs and world-class winemakers in attendance.
With guidance from Napa Valley winemakers,

The Food & Wine Festival included, above, chef Beau MacMillan, shown with Brigitte Hashron and Mary Luciant; Chilean sea bass and sides; below, a wine and food class on chocolate with chocolate sprinkled with bacon; inset above left, lionfish pizzetta.

including Heidi Barrett of LaSirena wines, we learned how to pair various wines with foods like Humboldt Fog goat cheese, conch, grouper, hazelnut moose, lamb and prosciutto.

JS Richer, the sommelier for our Wine & Chocolate class, admitted "wines can be pretentious, but what it really comes down to is what you like." Thanks to JS, I now know to grab a bottle of syrah whenever I get the urge to splurge on some dark chocolate sprinkled with bacon.
There's plenty of gourmet grazing going on during the festival, but the down-home joints and local hero chefs also get their day in the sun. Save some room for a visit to the Island Street Food Fair in downtown Provo, where the big event is the barbecue rib cook-off. You can sample the entries of more than a dozen local chefs vying for the barbecue trophy or, if you prefer, seek out other popular fare available — jerk chicken, shrimp and fish, plus local beer and rum.
One last tip: Don't leave the country without trying the crown jewel of TCI cuisine: queen conch. The best place to get it is at da Conch Shack, a little open-air place by the sea on the Blue Hill side of the island. They put the queen conch right out of the ocean ... and cook it up every way imaginable.
Sitting at one of the picnic-style tables overlooking the water, our toes in the sand, we sampled fresh conch salad (ceviche style), cracked conch (battered and deep-fried) and conch fritters (the classic fried food). We also tried their slrimp, going lobster and grouper and washed it down with some of their famous rum punch.
Yes, by now we were well-practiced in the art of sampling everything.
Once past the finish line, participants compared notes on the experience. I asked food blogger Hashron for her review. "The event was stellar," she said, echoing the general consensus. "It exceeded all of my expectations and then some."
She smiled then and shared one bit of wisdom she gained from the experience: "I should have worn looser clothing." No big deal, I thought, anything looks great when accessorized with a flame-red wig.

Inset above left, lionfish pizzetta.

PHOTOS BY BRY LUCIANT, BRIGITTE HASHRON/SPICEDALTO THE RECORD

Da Conch Shack serves fresh queen conch right out of the sea. At left, Michelle Garcia (center in red wig), from Chicago, and a group of friends from around the country get together every year for their annual Wigoberfest, this year on TCI.

Festival facts

Festivals are a great way to meet local people and experience a real slice of their culture. Turks and Caicos stages many festivals throughout the year to celebrate various aspects of food, music and island life.
■ The 2013 edition of the Caribbean Food & Wine Festival is Oct. 31 through Nov. 2. Celebrity chefs scheduled to attend include Christina Tosi of Momofuku Milk Bar in New York, Tiffany Derry from Season 7 of Bravo's "Top Chef" series and Kaitawa Ndotiya, Nelson Mandela's personal chef for more than 20 years. Info: caribbeanfoodandwinefestival.com.
■ Turks and Caicos Conch Festival: The 10th annual fest is scheduled for Nov. 30. conchfestival.com.
■ Maskanoo: Held on Boxing Day (the day after Christmas), this year marks the fourth year for the celebration, a showcase of the islands' cultural roots. Maskanoo is a mix of Junkanoo (a parade linked to the islands' Bahamian heritage) and Masquerade, an African version of the masquerade ball tradition. Maskanoo includes a parade, local music, island food, crafts and cultural items for sale, and more. Held in Providenciales, along the Grace Bay strip.
MORE INFO ON VISITING THE ISLANDS: Contact the Turks and Caicos Tourist Board, turksandcaicos.tourism.com.

